PREFACE

TO THE THIRD SERIES.

THE Alphabet is arranged in lessons, in this little book, that the child may first learn the vowels, then the consonants which require a vowel after them in the pronunciation, and then those which require a vowel before them in pronouncing them; thus acquiring the letters in distinct analytical parts. It is very injudicious to teach a child the Alphabet by course, that is, to commence with the letter A, and sound the whole Alphabet to the child at one lesson: no child or adult, however strong his memory may be, is capable of remembering all the sounds of the Alphabet, and the characters which represent them, until he shall have learned them separately, or those of nearly the same sound by having them classed.

A few combinations of letters, and words of one, two, and three syllables, have been inserted to aid my young friends in learning the pleasing and interesting art of combining letters to form words
